Programme Is Confined to

Works of Beethoven-Audi-

Jaques Thibaud, violinist, and Harold

Bauer, planist, gave a concert of music for their two instruments at Aeolian

Hall last evening. The programme was confined to works of Beethoven, namely, connect to works of Becthoven, namely, four sonatas, A major, opus 30; E flat, opus 12; A minor, opus 23, and G major, opus 30. The arrangement, it will be seen, did not attempt a chronological order nor did it go as far as the last works of the type written by Beethoven.

But it was none the less a representalive programme. One sonata from the group of three composing the first opus (No. 12), written for plane and violin, the opus 23, which stands by itself in the middle of the list and one from the second group of three constituting opus 10, made an excellent scheme. Both players are masters of chamber music performance. Both played last evening with sympathy and understand-ing. They have performed together so often that their ensemble is of a high order. There is left the always unset-tled question whether it is satisfying to the general hearer to listen to a series of works by one composer. There are still many who desire a greater variety of its wealth, does not depart from cap-tivating simplicity of idea till the period of the last compositions is reached. Means. Bauer and Thibaud had a large audience, and the demonstrations of pleasure were of the kind that have rea-

"The boys in north Russia are completely cut off from human companionship. They live in boxcars like animals, and squads go down to the railroad front and the river front for guard duty. So we established a little boxcar canteen down at this railroad front, which is about 150 miles from the camp, and Marcia Dunham was the first girl to attempt living down there. She had to sleep on a bench in the end of the boxcar, and so we relayed going down there for three weeks at a time. The cold is intense and the loneliness is awful. In the summer it, is one great marsh and in the winter a huge frozen plain.

"The boys have good health; it is a healthier country than England, and they have plenty of food. Naturally the boys want to get home; that's the main thing. The warfare is something like that of South Africa. The Russians show a distinct friendliness to the work wa

The smiling, uniformed girl who sat in the reception room of the Y. W. C. A. on Fifty-second street yesterday afternoon looked as though the wildest thing she could have seen during the last few years was a the dansant. Yet the story this girl told was one of bitter struggle in the icebound regions of north Russia, where allied troops are holding the Archangel front. She was Miss Elizabeth Boies of Cincinnati, Ohlo, who volunteered in the spring of 1917 to undertake the work of getting some com-
